

Computer Science at Vassar is very theory-focused. I saw students move to both academia or industry depending on their desires. I felt the coursework was on the easy side, but I also felt I got a good grasp of core CS concepts and had no issue finding a job.

Would echo the statement our resident Moose made about the career development office. At best, they'll help you edit your resume. Use your alumni network as a resource; it is far more powerful and helpful.

Another downside is the lack of career fairs where companies come to Vassar. Your application process will be more push, where you're applying to jobs, than pull, where companies are seeking you out, so you'll need to be more self-motivated.
